Excerpt: .for his short account of the islands, which was appended to a volume entitled. Shetland Flora, the publication of which, a few years afterward, brought him into public notice as an authority upon certain points which he had carefully investigated. His botanical tour with Professor Forbes resulted in a correspondence invaluable to Thomas, and honorable, and even profitable, to the mature scholar, who from the first had a high appreciation of. the remarkable genius of his young companion. He writes to him from Edinburgh, in April, 1840, Circumstances have so fallen out that I have not been able to answer your most interesting letter before this. I regret that Mr. Goodsir and I did not take the route in Shetland we first intended, the more so, as the specimens you mention would have been invaluable treasures, as I am busily occupied with the lower classes of...

Reviews

This publication is amazing. It is definitely basic but shocks in the fifty percent of your publication. You won't feel monotony at anytime of your own time (that's what catalogues are for concerning if you question me).
