They keep us in the false comfort of what should be a cocoon. But, instead of metamorphosis, we are eaten. Or even worse, we consume ourselves through fear and waiting. After pretending to be crazy for so long, Iris can't gauge her sanity anymore. She slips from in-patient therapy to her version of reality: lost love, loud music, overdoses, self-loathing, high school. Through Iris eyes, the story reveals the monsters in her mind and in her house, existing behind the jumble of her confessional journals and poetry, where she is kept a victim of [her] own regret. Iris spills all of her innocence trying to fix herself, Like dead leaves caught in spider webs, a little more broken each moment.
