It has a coast line of a hundred and five miles, and is one of the finest harbors in the world. Islands of various size dot the water; many of them hills of volcanic origin, rising abruptly out of the waves, their sides covered with tropical verdure, and their summits adorned by cozy cottages. Westward the shores of the bay rise first into hills, then into mountains; the Corcovadaand the Gavea towering like giants above their neighbors. From the belfry of Gloria Cathedral one may behold a magnificent view of the city and bay. A stone wall five miles long and fifteen feet high protects the lower part of the city from the breakers. On some of the mountain-tops are built summer houses and hotels, which are the resort of the wealthy during the hot season or when an epidemic prevails. Twenty miles distant tower the Organ mountains. On these heights stands Petropolis, where the foreign diplomats have their headquarters, and where is located the magnificent summer palace of the ex-emperor. At eight oclock of a sultry evening in the June of 1800. two men stood on the shore of this beautiful bay, watching the lights flash from hundreds of ships. The bay seemed encircled by countless stars. The faces of these two men bore the unmistakable stamp of their Hebrew origin. The younger, a man in the prime of life, was tall, athletic and finely proportioned. His jet black hair was streaked with gray. His face was clean shaven, and his features large and well cut. His large, dark eyes glowed with intense brightness beneath heavy,...
