*Merely no terms to spell out. We have read through and i also am confident that i will gonna read yet again again in the future. You will not sense monotony at anytime of your own time (that's what catalogs are for about should you question me).

The thermometer that is used in taking flue temperatures should be of the highest grade. It should be bought of a dealer, whose knowledge of instruments of this kind has given him an established reputation, and it should be tested from time to time, to detect any changes that it may undergo as the result of continued use. 77. RADIATION: The loss of heat by radiation from boilers and their settings, and from steam pipes, may be very serious indeed, unless care is taken to keep it down to as small an amount as possible. In some parts of the country it is common to see boilers standing out of doors, with no protection, even in winter, except the roof over them, --the sides of the boiler shed often being entirely open to the weather, with little or no provision for shielding the boilers and piping from the cold out-door air. This is exceedingly bad practice, not only on account of the waste of fuel that it entails, but also because the chilling action of the air upon the heated metal gives rise to severe strains that shorten the life of the boiler, and sometimes lead to immediate rupture. Stationary boilers should always be properly housed in and covered, and portable ones should be enclosed by suitable coverings that will protect them from direct exposure to the air. Pipes conveying steam should also be effectively covered with heat-insulating material, to reduce the radiation and condensation as much as...
